Occupy protesters appeared to be preparing for legal action against some of the more confrontational members of their group in San Francisco as hundreds of police officers in riot gear swarmed the area on Sunday. Police presence in the city escalated in the wee hours of Sunday, when police issued a raid of an occupied Mission Street encampment early Sunday morning in San Francisco, where thousands of people had converged over the past two weeks to protest wealth and power. On the eve of the 60th anniversary of the March on Washington, the protest movement faced a moment of reckoning, a turning point in its history. On Sunday, President Obama addressed the movement in the Rose Garden, calling for "public patience" and at least some agreement to allow the protest to continue. "Look, at some point we're going to have to make some decisions about how to move forward. That's never been the American tradition," he told reporters. "I do not believe that it is helpful to have a bunch of folks blocking traffic or preventing emergency vehicles from getting to areas where they need to go," he said. "I'm not suggesting that anyone who has a permit should be given a free pass, because I don't believe that anyone who is violating someone else's constitutional rights should be allowed to do so." The protest movement has lost some members over the course of its time in the streets and has taken a more confrontational stance, including berating reporters. But there's also a new group of protesters and new energy. The Rev. Al Sharpton, for example, arrived in Washington this morning to lend moral support to the protesters, but was stopped from entering. A spokesperson for a similar assembly in Oakland wrote on Saturday night that the group was "asking the NIMBY's (not in my backyard) to respect the rights of others to assemble and peacefully protest. The justifiable right to assembly is critical to the survival of this great nation." The protest group, called Occupy Wall Street, had for several weeks surrounded Zuccotti Park in the financial district, and mostly blocked traffic, particularly on and around Market Street. There were some confrontations with police officers, but the protest had a quieter tone than expected 82138339de
