Wojcicki and it co-founder Dieter Rams have shaped the design of products that are in many homes across the world — from lamps and printers to refrigerators and vacuum cleaners — and have become symbols of "good" industrial design. But Wojcicki — who was instrumental in curating the historical artifacts on display — brought the work of designers to a younger generation of Silicon Valley tinkerers. Wojcicki joined the Bay Area in 1995 and hung her shingle there in 2010. Her mentor and friend, Rams, died in 2011. "She's made more of a difference than she realizes," says Eileen Fagan, president of the American Institute of Graphic Arts, and a frequent visitor of the museum. "And if you could tell her that, she would be very moved." "What's the point of even doing anything if nobody even wants to look at it?" she said. In 2013, the design museum gained some of its most notable artifacts in the collection, including a 1927 Braun electrical household appliance, which was the first to combine a refrigerator, freezer and air conditioner in one unit. The design museum, however, was years ahead of Braun in recognizing the need to showcase contributions by women in the field
