Free windows 10 iso, such as the Windows 10 ISO file, can be used to boot from. Bunnie's much more technical articles: - When scanning the sflash command, the important thing to note is to have the correct value in the left most column, corresponding to the two values in the top left. I tried replacing the values and entered the second column (MCU) to 0x62 instead of 0x51. This seemed to work fine, but when I attempt to flash the micro via programming mode it flashes the micro and immediately shuts down. I am not sure what to do next! It is not even a long enough target to test it on. I also tried erasing the flash using the cp. But if I run the cp command, it flashes the micro and shuts down. Any suggestions??? I don't think it is possible to use the sflash tool to flash a microchip, regardless of the chip type, because the only parameter in common to all the microcontrollers is the target address, which must be programmed into the microchip using programming mode. I don't know what the target address is for the MCP3008 target that you are using, but the addresses for the MCPxxx targets are listed at the MCPxxx page of the MCP3208 page of the product page for the MCP3008 (programming mode page that I linked to above) There might be another method to program the part (without using the sflash tool), but since the target address must be programmed one way or another to successfully transfer the program into the MCP3008, this method would have to be done with the help of a multimeter to measure voltage. This method is described in more detail on the following page of the MCP3008 page of the product page for the MCP3008: This section can potentially be a little long and detailed, so if you are a newbie and have no idea what you are doing, you might want to just skip this section and skip to section A.3.3, which is much more easy to follow. If you are comfortable reading and understand this section then you can potentially follow the rest of the page, but be careful because some things can be really hard to understand and take a long time to learn, like reading code. The method that I'm explaining here is the programming method used on the MCP3008.

I know I can read from a specific part of memory a constant time, but what about writing? What happens if I write to a constant memory address? Is it equivalent to direct memory access? A: As you guess, it's a matter of how the hardware is implemented: some processors have dedicated read and write instructions which have constant time (e.g. Intel x86). other processors use a dedicated load/store instruction that have constant time (e.g. ARMv7 for 64 bits, RISC and MIPS for 32 bits). other processors implement "memory locations" as instructions (e.g. some ARMv7). other processors use indirect addressing (e.g. other ARMv7). These days, processors implement memory locations as an
