Relationship between dietary phytoestrogen and ovarian cancer in a prospective cohort study. There is conflicting evidence regarding the role of dietary phytoestrogens in ovarian cancer risk. We prospectively investigated the relationship between dietary phytoestrogen intake and ovarian cancer risk in the Selmon study of the New England Centenarian Study cohort. The Selmon study is a prospective follow-up study of elderly women living in the same area and selected on the basis of their high reproductive potential. Among 98 women who developed an incident ovarian cancer, it was observed that 77 of them had collected a portion of their diet at least three times between 1989 and 1995. During this period, a 137-case group and a 137-control group were enrolled from the remaining women. Information on diet was collected by means of a validated semiquantitative food-frequency questionnaire at baseline and the last follow-up visit. Diet was modeled by means of a point-a-day method. There were no significant differences between cases and controls in the total intake of isoflavones, lignans, or any of their subcomponents. However, a borderline association was observed for total phytoestrogen intake, with a significantly increased risk in women with more than 25.0 mg of isoflavones per day (relative risk = 2.03; P = 0.074). This association was observed in never-smoking, nonsmoking, nulliparous, and postmenopausal women, suggesting that a protective role of dietary phytoestrogens is not restricted to women with a higher risk of developing ovarian cancer.What is Work in Progress? What is Work in Progress? This is a phrase that comes up a lot when we talk about software development processes and one we have been known to use ourselves. In this, what we are talking about is a phrase borrowed from the textile industry. For some reason, when textile industry software developers in the UK are working on a project, they call it, "work in progress".
