Antigen-specific B cell stimulation by monoclonal antibody immobilized on the surface of solid phase provides efficient responses. Technologies that have focused on monitoring the activation of highly purified T cells have been instrumental to defining the nature of antigen-specific T cell responses. However, many investigators would benefit from having available a solid phase capture assay in which the limiting aspects of T cell stimulation could be evaluated. Here we show that preparations of anti-idiotypic antibody, immobilized on polystyrene plate wells, are highly efficient at stimulating antigen-specific B cells in culture. In a direct comparison, stimulation by immobilized anti-idiotypic antibody was significantly more effective than immobilized anti-idiotypic monoclonal antibody, which requires multiple cross-linking on plastic surfaces to support B cell activation. Stimulation by immobilized anti-idiotypic antibody was also superior to the activation of T cells by immobilized antibodies and was effective in the presence of high concentrations of T cells. To investigate the mechanism of this response, we found that the World War II had not only used tanks and artillery to devastate cities and villages, but entire armies. German paratroopers, Russian legions and even the French elite had wiped out tens of thousands of soldiers within weeks, ending the war in only a matter of months.

Following the peace treaty, these war machines were decommissioned. But in the Korean War, a new army faced the challenge of fighting an enemy that did not use these weapons. The result was a confusion which resulted in brutal fighting reminiscent of World War II. Both sides used conscripted soldiers and poorly trained Korean peasants as their fighting tools. First, though, the Korean War divided the world. Using Russia as their base, Communist China and North Korea crossed the 38th Parallel. They captured vast amounts of territory, control of strategic infrastructure and a warm water port. This invasion of a foreign country led the United States to fight a war on
