Endoscopic evaluation of gastric and duodenal mucosa in breast cancer patients. The prevalence of Helicobacter pylori infection has been associated with an increased risk of breast cancer. Early detection of the infection and eradication of this infection may reduce the risk of breast cancer. Recently, it has been demonstrated that histologic evidence of gastritis and duodenitis may be detected endoscopically in a significant number of patients with a low incidence of peptic ulcer disease. Endoscopy may be a useful method for the detection of gastric and duodenal mucosal abnormalities. We evaluated the prevalence of Helicobacter pylori infection in two groups of breast cancer patients, one treated with radiation and the other with breast-conserving surgery. The hypothesis was that breast cancer patients would have a higher incidence of Helicobacter pylori infection than age-matched controls. Twenty-six consecutive patients treated with radiation therapy and 26 consecutive patients treated with conservative surgery, 16 with biopsy-proven carcinoma of the breast, were enrolled. In the control group, 26 age-matched, sex-matched patients were enrolled. All patients were evaluated for gastroesophageal reflux disease and had upper endoscopies performed. Two endoscopists independently performed the gastroscopies and duodenoscopies and were unaware of any patient characteristics. The same histologic criteria were used for gastritis and duodenitis. The prevalence of Helicobacter pylori infection was higher in the breast cancer group (86.7% vs. 55.2%; p
