Facing reality: alternatives to client-centered treatment. Psychotherapists use a range of potential interventions to promote insight or change in their clients. For example, they may try to enhance client insight, or to promote change using interventions such as psychiatric medication, direct psychosocial interventions, and cognitive behavioral therapy. Psychotherapy is thought to be effective in the treatment of a range of psychological problems, and several meta-analyses have shown that psychotherapy is equally effective across a broad range of disorders. This article examines the evidence that interventions such as the use of psychotropic drugs, "talking cure," religious counseling, and traditional psychotherapy can be equally effective. In the second part of the article, the author considers a number of psychological interventions that are considered to be less central to the therapeutic alliance, and shows that the evidence on their effectiveness is rather thin. The final part of the article looks at the justification for offering treatment that could be described as client-centered, and questions why, in this era of scientific evidence, psychologists do not seem to be prepared to do so.

O'Malley Orgs UP To $2,000 In Fees For Alleged Misuse Of Funds
Maryland Attorney General Doug Gansler September 15, 2007|By CINDY STENGEL |
cstengel@sauerkc.com, SALISBURY — To his supervisors' surprise, Salisbury-based contractor Kenneth R. Moore, Jr. has been paying the attorney general's office more than $5,500 in legal fees for "overwhelmingly" frivolous or improper claims. The attorney general's office, which has filed a suit against Moore for allegedly mispending state jobs grant funds, is being investigated for possible misuse of funds by the Maryland State Police, the Baltimore Sun has reported. Moore, who has no police training, is on leave from the state Highway Administration pending a police investigation, a spokesman for the attorney general said. In depositions, government employees denied providing company vouchers to Moore to conduct highway work, while others testified that Moore's wife told them the couple had spent the money on a home renovation. Moore, employed by his family's company, Duralite, was given a $2,000 company credit card and a $1,600 company check to purchase parts for the couple's boat and motor home. Stephen E. Jenkins, the attorney for the Maryland State Highway Administration, said the state grants are c6a93da74d
