Director Richard Attenborough decided he wanted to make a film about Gandhi in 1962 after reading a biography. He received Nehru's approval. According to Rosbalt, he began working on the film in 1963 and worked on it until his death, until 1978, not knowing that he had already made it. As you know, Nehru did not give permission to shoot the film, but Attenborough still shot it. "He was one of those rare people who could not be disrespected," said the director. He also added that he was very attached to Nehru. "I have been his great friend for many years. He had an amazing ability to connect with people," he added.

What would you say to someone who had experienced a trauma or who has experienced loss and challenges in their lives and yet they still have a positive, affirming worldview and they still pursue life in spite of it? Alex: Well, I think, firstly, we really need to kind of like disentangle the two, because when you're thinking about it philosophically—because I mean I didn't know that I was thinking about it philosophically, but what's happened to me certainly has kind of brought me to the next level of thinking about it philosophically—but when I'm thinking about it philosophically, then one thing is that I need to be able to know that I can give up on things. I don't know if I could—but I certainly have the idea that if you start, say, one day to not do something you're passionate about, then I can' c6a93da74d
