NITE Team 4 [CRACKED] Crack Highly Compressed

Hello- For four years I was having occasional pain in one of my lower molars when biting certain foods. I had the tooth checked multiple times but the dentist couldnt visualize a problem. Fast forward, I moved and got a new dentist. She said I probably had a crack and recommended a crown, which I had placed about six weeks ago. The bite was slightly off and I was experiencing the same pain as before when biting, so I went back to her so she could file down the crown. In the process, she went through the porcelain to the metal. She told me this was rare but could happen and that I would need the whole crown replaced on the house because cosmetically this was unacceptable. Trouble is, even with my bite corrected, I am still having the exact same pain I had while biting BEFORE the crown but now it is WORSE and more frequent. I dont have any pain or sensitivity other than when I bite. Once the bite is release, the pain goes away and according to x-rays, my root looks fine. Before I go back for the second crown, what would be your recommendation Your visit with the dentist is likely a result of a tooth that suffered a fracture. Therefore, it's likely your tooth is cracked or broken. I would recommend an x-ray to confirm your tooth is cracked or broken. There may be calcified material in the tooth that was built up over the years. I recommend a dentist to remove that material. If a tooth cracks, there's no need for medication. If a tooth has to be removed, a root canal should then be done to save the tooth. To save the tooth from future infections, you should take good oral hygiene care regularly. Do not use cotton in your mouth or any other instrument such as a bottle brush or toothpick. Clean your toothbrush with fluoride-free mouthwash. Lastly, make sure you visit the dentist for an examination and cleaning.

NITE Team 4 Crack Highly Compressed

Bauer Bryan I really appreciate the response. After getting to know you from the chat, I have to say you have been a really great help. I have run into this problem before and have seen many people with cracked teeth on NITE. I have a large composite filling on #2 upper left tooth that is very sensitive and has dull biting pain and when I bite down it hurts to my tooth. I was told its nerve damage but that was from another dentist many years ago. I was referring to a permanent crown, I am not trying to keep the filling in there. I did a consultation with him before getting the crown and he said it was a tooth that was making people very sick, he doesnt want people getting sick so he wanted to do the drilling and crown. I had to quickly change my mind when I saw the x-rays. He said I needed a root canal (which I was fine with). My question is, since it was metal fillings and there is no decay, will I need a root canal? Is it getting metal fillings that a possible root canal is needed? I am to the point of being scared that I have a root canal and if I dont get that fixed its going to make me sick. From the responses that I read is that temporary crowns only last a few weeks and wouldnt be able to fix it. I just wanted to see if any of you had been in this situation before and wanted to ask you your opinions before I take the plunge and a root canal. Thanks so much! Bauer Bryan, I just read your response and wow, thank you so much for talking to me about this. I am truly grateful. I was contacted by a Realtor friend of mine and she had a tooth with composite filling where it was exposed to the nerve. The pain was bad and she was scared she had gone into root canal territory. Ive never met her dentist before but was referred to her from another dentist who she said knew him well. He gave her some xrays and said the tooth was cracked and that it was hard to see and a root canal was needed. She was so scared of the root canal and made a doctor appt with this other dentist. He said he saw it clearly and that she did not need to have a root canal. I want to express my utmost appreciation for your communication on this topic. Ive read your response and it has relieved my mind and given me the courage to actually make a doctor appointment with the same dentist and have it confirmed. She seemed so scared she wasnt going to feel better and I was trying to talk her into getting it looked at sooner but she didnt want to pay that money just to feel better. Im so grateful that she called me and came to me and I was honest with her. I dont think she would have followed through if i werent honest with her. Im actually going to see this dentist this coming Monday. I pray he will be honest with me too because the last dentist did not do a root canal and still thinks she needs a root canal. I dont want to be told that now she needs a root canal. Thank you so much again. I am honored and truly grateful for your kindness in your response. Ive read it twice and it reassured me. Im so happy. 5ec8ef588b
