Neutral amino acids, insulin, and glucose disposal in diabetes. Neutral amino acids (L-phenylalanine, L-leucine, L-isoleucine, L-valine, L-methionine, L-tryptophan, and L-tyrosine) inhibit in vitro the phosphorylation of endogenous proteins to the same extent in both normal and insulin-deficient diabetic rat liver tissue. These amino acids inhibit both uptake and efflux of glucose by the liver with the exception of L-phenylalanine, which stimulates both processes. In contrast to other amino acids, L-phenylalanine stimulates uptake of glucose in the presence of excess insulin, possibly because of an insulin-independent effect on the glucose carrier. It is postulated that the effect of neutral amino acids on glucose oxidation is mediated through changes in the availability of coenzymes and cofactors and/or their transfer to gluconeogenic enzymes.
