Erythropoietin (Epo) stimulates erythroid maturation in human and mouse erythroid precursors in vitro. Recently we have demonstrated that the mature erythroblast population in human progenitor bone marrow cells was not responsive to Epo treatment. In the present study, a purified recombinant human Epo, including both dimeric and tetrameric forms of Epo, was found to stimulate the maturation of human erythroblasts in vitro in the absence of any additional soluble factors. A single treatment of mature erythroblasts with the Epo completely induced differentiation of the cells and production of hemoglobin. Furthermore, the Epo increased the level of globin chains and hemoglobin synthesis, as well as the ratio of gamma/alpha globin mRNA. However, the expression of the transferrin receptor, which is another marker of erythroid maturation, was not affected. When the experiments were repeated
