Regardless of your preference for analog or digital photography, Photoshop is a handy tool for many different types of photo editing. It's widely (if not universally) accepted as the best image-editing application available. Commercial clients require some kind of content protection, and Photoshop CC subscribers receive the Ad hoc sharing feature which enables them to create both CD and DVD discs for office collaboration. As I said earlier, Lightroom is mostly about speed. This is reflected by the very fact that we have been getting better and better update features and tools for the last few years. In fact, it would be a rather boring statement if I were to say that each update was "simply faster than the previous version." If this were the case, then all our fears of Lightroom becoming a beast should be dispelled. However, let's get one thing straight – speed is relative. Lightroom needs to be occasionally compared to competitors in order to recognize improvements. For example, if we were to compare Lightroom with the older Photoshop CS versions, then the latter are much easier to program and use. When it comes to Linux-based software, Lighter Room is similar in its ability to quickly generate files and edit images. It also supports many utilities that are not supported by Photoshop, such a Multipage Toning, a very useful feature in my opinion. The Slice tool is also a smart idea for working with RAW images, but it does not offer the level of flexibility of tools that can be used with Lightroom. However, Photoshop does have some amazing tools that can save hours of your time, such as Liquify, Colorize, and come to the rescue of precise masking. Lightroom has to constantly make one or more compromises in order to accommodate new features, resulting in an often less than ideal implementation or only an approximation of Photoshop tools.
